Knowledge and skills

Students on this degree will be taught the practical and technical skills to make programmes. As well as gaining hands on experience students will enhance their research, analysis and communication skills by studying the social and historical context of television.

Professional accreditation

Accredited by Skillset (the Sector Skills Council for the Creative Media) as part of the University's Skillset Media Academy, a national centre of excellence in media education.

Career opportunities

The degree aims to produce graduates who will go on to work primarily in the television industry. Further opportunities might exist in film, facilities or in-house media. Typically graduates entering media begin by working in trainee, assistant and runner roles. In the longer term graduates might aim to find positions in production e.g. as production mixers, boom operators, camera operators, lighting or in post-production e.g. as re-recording mixers or editors, in directing and research. Detailed job descriptions can be found at www.skillset.org.uk/careers.

The media industry is competitive. It is common for students and graduates to take unpaid work experience to build up their contacts and skills both during their degree and after it.
